Most writing assignments at the college level should be written in third person unless otherwise specified by the professor. However, because first and second person are the voices used during everyday life, it is easy to use them while writing. To convert a paper into the formal third person voice of academic writing, follow these steps: 1.

Capella University Writing Center May 2007 Writing in Third Person: What not using the first person REALLY means Your instructors tell you not to use first person in scholarly writing. So you can't write a sentence like this: I think the theory can be applied in this situation. You may be tempted, then, to write the same idea like this:

both first person and third person for all paper. (Second person "you" is not acceptable.) The key is to select one grammatical person (do not to switch haphazardly between the two), and be consistent. It is important to think about which "person" makes the most sense for a given assignment.

Third-person point of view identifies people by proper noun (a given name such as Ella Clark) or noun (such as teachers, students, doctors, or players) and uses the pronouns he, she, and they. Third person also includes the use of one, everyone, and anyone. Most formal, academic writing uses the third person.
